

Uri Bronfenbrenner

Bronfenbrenner sees the world in which the child grows as having a major influence on development. He describes this as a two-way influence. The personality and behaviour of the child will influence the way people in the environment will interact with that child. He also believes that the interactions between environmental factors could affect the child's development.

Theories In Practice

- Educator's need to foster positive relationships with children and families.
- Our interaction and support for families will affect their children's development.
- Ensure that we present programs within our service that reflect the needs and expectations of the society, culture and community in which our children live.
